software, the computer, the egg, and the boar A: I am not familiar with that term, and it has caused a few problems at Stack Overflow. But let's solve this and see what happens. You have already found it easy to fix: you simply have to write a unicode-normalized version of your word. It seems that even though you are dealing with English words, the result is always a Unicode word. Now we are talking about a word from the computer world, not English. Anyhow, let's try it. The solution Just write a function that extracts only the characters from a given string, character by character, and that unescapes them. Unicode strings (which are encoded in UTF-8): must start with the full-fledged BMP, including a BOM; are divided into code points, usually 4 bytes long;

can always be easily decoded into UTF-8, a regular ASCII-compatible encoding, using Unicode UTF-8 Decoder, Maybe you found the Wikipedia article about Unicode already. I hope so. I'd write it as follows: def unescape_unicode_text(text): # pretend that the string is already in UTF-8 encoding # \uxxxx is just for pretty printing the Unicode string u =
