Shooting the tonal range of an image In digital photography, the _tonal range_ of an image is the range of shadows, mids, and highlights in the image. Figure 10-7 shows a series of photos that were captured from the same image, but the exposure changed from a light to a dark image with each consecutive exposure. Not all images, whether captured digitally or with a film camera, can be shot at all levels of exposure; you must choose a level that gives you the best image quality based on lighting and the scene. The very first time I met Dr. Josho, my stepfather, was in his early-thirties. We were both at the hospital following a calamitous and near-fatal car accident. Dr. Josho was in his mid-twenties, had studied medicine in college, and was an experienced physician. We got to know each other during a series of hospital visits, and I remember one day watching him play with his patient's children. He asked them what they wanted to do when they grew up, and as I watched these playful interactions between two young doctors, I realized how very close they were as friends, how comfortable they were with each other. Over the next three years, Dr. Josho and I shared many events and opportunities. Eventually, I left home and attended college, but Dr. Josho remained a presence in my life. The two of us saw each other nearly every other week, talking politics and the world, or just hanging out. When I married Dr. Josho's older sister's son, my stepfather helped officiate the wedding, and the two of us played soccer together when I coached an informal team. Eventually, Dr. Josho and I stopped playing soccer together. He'd started fencing, and his schedule was too packed. Soon, the team disbanded, and we stopped talking nearly as much. Then, about 10 years ago, I moved back to my home town, and Dr. Josho started playing soccer again. I was stunned by the transformation in him, and later, I started playing with him. We've been playing together regularly ever since. We've played all the way from training through the playoffs. This past weekend, I watched him play in the Final Four. When I asked him what he liked about soccer, he said his love is finding ways to get through the game, and win. "I love to watch you play," he told me. "You play and you win." Dr. Josho recently had a health scare, and has been feeling run down, tired, and not well. For all my running around with the kids, I'm exhausted as well. As we played, I kept thinking, I hope I'm not like this when he's old. Today, I saw him on a couch, stretched

Q: Why do 0-1 loss functions only exist in this simple problem? Taken from Stanford CS231d Course notes. In Section 3.3.2, the addition of a 0-1 loss function causes BERT to achieve roughly better results on both MNIST and CIFAR-10 in experiments with cosine similarity loss. Why does it make a difference? It is because the cosine loss is typically strongly convex, and so the loss function is more concentrated around its minimum value. A convex objective function is $$f_\lambda(x) = \frac{1}{2}f(x)^T f(x) + \lambda g(x)^T f(x)$$ where $f(x)$ is the loss, $g(x)$ is the gradient and λ is a regularization parameter. Convex functions can be minimized using optimization algorithms, and when applied to a simple case (ignoring regularization terms) the optimizer solves the problem
