So, what does the new tech allow and how can you benefit from it? Read on to see what HyperMotion Technology is and find out how it can impact your game and your team. The new playable virtual striker movement Overwatch is a team-based shooter and one of the best competitive FPSes around. The game showcases a very unique animation system, namely that the player (and sometimes, the enemy player) are allowed to move freely and react independently within a range of possible movement. The team motion you know from FIFA 22 It's a system that was implemented because the player is expected to react and move independently within a six-player tight group, as well as against the teammate, the teammate's teammate, the defender etc. The system is helped by a smooth and fluid movement through relatively short distances. Player movement is not restricted to a fixed motion, but rather moved to a set of predetermined possibilities. If you want to move towards the opponent, you can, but you might also move towards the teammate or move away from the teammate. The system is also helped by the player's animations. There are other gaming titles, such as Overwatch or FIFA, which also allow players to make facial gestures. But, on FIFA, these gestures affect the player's animations in terms of speed or motion. For example, the face of a player who is celebrating during a goal can be puffed up, in order to make the player look like a satisfied cat. In Overwatch, these animations are tied to individual facial animations, whereas in FIFA, they are tied to gestures which are part of the player's animations, i.e. facial animation. Thus, in FIFA you are allowed to blow out or puff your cheeks as many times as you like, you only have to wait for the animation to finish. FIFA 19 featured a similar animation system for the virtual player, although the system was not used in all of FIFA 19. For example, in the AI controlled players, the player is limited to one movement possibility (for example, moving towards the opponent), whereas you are allowed to use the system in the real player as well as in the AI controlled player. We strongly feel that FIFA has the potential to bring more players to watch football because the quality of the player animation is constantly improving, and because FIFA players can better relate to the animations. In FIFA 22, we will implement
