Effect of phenobarbital, chlorpromazine, and a benzodiazepine receptor antagonist on the density of surface alpha-amino-3-hydroxy-5-methyl-4-isoxazolepropionic acid receptors. We have examined the effect of varying the levels of stimulation on the density of excitatory amino acid receptors in hippocampal membrane preparations. The density of receptors was determined by measurements of the binding of [³H]alpha-amino-3-hydroxy-5-methyl-4-isoxazole-propionic acid [(³H)AMPA]. Stimulation increased the affinity of [³H]AMPA for the receptors. An increase in [³H]AMPA binding is inversely related to increasing concentration of extracellular Ca²⁺ with a Hill coefficient of 1.0. The potentiation of [³H]AMPA binding by phenobarbital was readily reversible. However, chlorpromazine, a clathrin stabilizer, reversibly and specifically depressed the effects of stimulation by increasing the number of binding sites with a Hill coefficient of 1.0 and an apparent dissociation constant (K_d) of 0.2 microM. The benzodiazepine receptor antagonist flumazenil (Ro 15-1788) depressed the potentiation of [³H]AMPA binding induced by phenobarbital
